HONGKONG, JULY 12th, 1876.

In no country, perhaps, has the advance of real knowledge acted more powerfully in a few short years to dispel illusions and superstitions than in Japan. The Buddhist priests, who formerly possessed almost unlimited power over the people, have been shorn of the substance and now only retain the mere shadow of the influence they once held. Under the ancient yoke the priesthood wielded untold power, and the people unreservedly revered them; and made them their lords and masters. The spread of knowledge has gone far to reverse all this, and the action of the Government lately has still further tended to rob the priests of their old importance. Very recently the heads of the Buddhist and Shinto sects were summoned to the Tokio Palace, and told that they were not to interfere with the use of prayers and charms between the sick and the physician. It will be seen from these, that the Government has pronounced the case hopeless. This is, of course, a comprehensive view of the question, for it is very certain that innovations and supplantings to their duties are not likely to work the cure if other means be neglected. Christians never leave the cure to be effected by interposition with the Almighty, for they have well-founded belief that Providence intended them to use the remedies which have been discovered. Pagan and semi-civilized nations, on the other hand, frequently, in the absence of any sufficient knowledge of medicine, leave the cure to be worked by Nature, making the will, frantic appeals to their gods to heal the sick. The action of the Japanese Government plainly betrays a loss of faith in the religion of Buddha. There is certainly some little danger that the Japanese may, in the rapid increase of knowledge, lose faith in all religion and sink into the cold shades of infidelity. It is over a century and a half since the first missionaries to exert themselves in the new Japan. The people of that country have to a large extent cast off the faith of their fathers, and are about to strike out on a sea of doubt and speculation. Cannot the pioneers of Christianity step in at this important juncture, and demonstrate how wide the truths—how comprehensive its teaching and applicability to the needs of every human being—of the religion of the Cross. Can they not show, in living language, that through science and knowledge the natural foes of ignorance and superstition, they are the handmaids of Christianity?

We have received a catalogue of the Chinese Imperial Maritime Customs Collection at the United States International Exhibition, Philadelphia. This volume, which is published by order of the Inspector-General of Customs, is quite a bulky one, and from a glance at its contents, it is evident that the Chinese collection has been a work of considerable labour, and is so comprehensive that it cannot fail to give an excellent idea of the resources and productions of the Empire. It is divided, very appropriately, into six departments, those of mining and metallurgy, manufactures, education and science, art, machinery, and agriculture. The metals and minerals make a fair show, and include specimens of coal from Hunan, Shantung, and North Formosa, pig iron from Fokien, steel from Hunan, tin-ore from Fokien, copper ore from Szechuan, sulphur from Formosa, gold-ore from Manchuria and Fokien, and silver-ore from Chekiang. Coal is, of course, the most widely distributed and important of Chinese mineral productions. Both anthracite and bituminous coal are found in great quantities all over the North of China; the extent of these deposits is reported, indeed, to be some 87,000 square miles. Hitherto, as all who have the least acquaintance with China know, it has not proved a source of wealth, owing to its never having been worked with proper appliances. Much the same may be said of iron. It abounds in Shansi, Szechuan, Hunan, Shantung, and elsewhere, but on account of the present imperfect means of communication and of transportation, together with the inferior system of manufacture followed by the Chinese, foreign iron can be laid down at the ports at less cost than the native article. The manufactures occupy no less than eighty-four pages of the book. A great deal of space is taken up by porcelain, a manufacture in which the Chinese have always held a high position. "Toilet of specimens is prepared by a short account of this important industry, from which we extract the following information. The chief seat of the manufacture is at the Imperial potteries at King-tai-chin, in the province of Kiangsi, from whence it is sent to all parts of the Empire and largely exported to foreign countries. A special kind of ware, ornamented with the fire-clay dragon, is made there for use in the Imperial household, and sent annually as tribute to Peking. Large manufactures also exist at Tung-shan-lieu and Chung-chow-fu, but the article produced is inferior to that of Kiangsi. This ware, especially the coarse quality, forms one of the principal exports of Amoy, and finds its way to Saigon, Siam, the Philippines, and other places. About forty thousand pieces of china ware and pottery is likewise annually produced at Kaopien, in the Tzu-chi district, and at Pan-hsi, in the Kiehyang district, Kwangtung. A small quantity of chinaware of the coarse kind is made in the vicinity of Canton for export to India and Europe. The fine porcelain exported from Canton is made at King-tai-chin, and only sent to Canton to be painted. Subjoined is a brief description of the mode of manufacture—which is certainly primitive enough—of the coarse china, ware and pottery. The clay, after being kneaded and worked into paste, is formed by hand into the required shapes, which are then placed in ovens with some straw and chaff. The ovens are filled through small holes in the top and the fire is kept up for twenty-four hours only. Pottery is the article in its rough brown state, whilst chinaware is glazed and painted with red earth, the colour being mixed with alum-water to prevent their changing during the burning process. The furniture, of which there is a good selection, comes chiefly from Canton and Ningpo, both of which cities are famous for the manufacture. A few articles are contributed from Shanghai, Szechuan, Kiangsi, and other places. Mattings, which are a considerable article of export, is well represented. The chief seat of this industry is the province of Kwangtung, but specimens of grasscloth from Formosa, Szechuan, Kiangsi, Hankow, Canton, priests, and other fabrics come from them. They are chiefly manufactured in Kwangtung, Fokien, Chekiang, and Kiangsi, though not confined to these provinces. What few woollen goods are made are produced in Manchuria and the northern provinces. As may be expected, the silk manufacture occupies a prominent position in the exhibition. This industry can be traced to a remote antiquity. We have no space to notice it at length, but the exhibits will certainly tend to increase the respect of foreigners for the manufacturing industries of China. The collections of clothing, jewellery, and ornaments, with lace in infinite variety, artificial flowers, corsets, and other must-form a very attractive exhibition. To students of Chinese history and manners the historical collections of national costumes will prove both interesting and instructive. Specimens of every kind of paper, and the stationary in common use in the Empire, are also shown. A vast variety of other articles follow, which it would be impossible to describe or enumerate, with an appendix containing a catalogue of the publications by Protestant Missionaries in China, which is itself interesting. A good map embellishes this handy volume and will prove useful for reference. Altogether it is apparent that the Customs Commissioners have done their work thoroughly, and that the products of China are well represented in the Philadelphia Palace of Industry.
